Determinants of fibrin clot strength measured with the TEG device. The TEG technique has been used to evaluate coagulation and fibrinolysis in patients. The TEG variables reflect clot formation and lysis in vitro, and are based on the change in the optical density of a modified test system after addition of activators. The purpose of this study was to determine the correlation between the TEG variables and various coagulation and fibrinolytic tests. TEG variables and conventional coagulation tests were measured in 165 normal and 245 abnormal (only coagulation tests) plasma samples from 85 inpatients treated at a university hospital. The TEG variables correlated positively with each other. Clot strength of the formed clots, expressed as LY30, correlated significantly with the other TEG variables. Strong correlations were observed between fibrinogen and prothrombin time, thrombin time, TEG variables, and the fibrin cross-linking test. In addition, linear relationships were found between the TEG variables and the other tests on initiation of the coagulation process. Fibrinogen, FII, and FVIII are the major determinants of LY30, whereas fibrinogen, FII, and FVII/VIII ratios are the major determinants of clot strength. Routine use of TEG variables in the clinical laboratory may improve diagnosis of patients with bleeding or hypercoagulable states, and predict therapeutic response to drugs.
