I have a couple of questions about the well-documented phenomenon in economic textbooks of a negative correlation between the yields on a given curve and the implied volatility for the same curve. It is definitely true that the implied vol of options has a negative relationship to the yield of the curves they are quoted on. However, the current state of the economy has a significant impact on these curves. Which means one may see higher yield curves with lower implied vol. Does this pattern still hold? If so, at what level of yield does it start to fail? Several textbooks seem to suggest that the volatility of the yield curve has a negative relationship to the yield curve itself. Which makes sense because by definition the volatility of a yield curve is the square root of the covariance of its yields. However, I don't see a pattern that fits this definition. The table below compares two observations (horizontal axis) with two yield curves (vertical axis). The values are in basis points, which is $1000 * \text{annualized volatility}$ in the table. The expected values can be seen to be positive and negative, suggesting that the volatility of curves with higher yields is actually lower than the vol of lower yield curves. I would think this would be reversed, because higher yields are lower vol and lower yields are higher vol. The information available in this website is not intended as investment advice.
