suitable for incorporating bottles of various sizes. Local structure of chromatin in nuclei of human tumor cells and its relation to malignancy and chemotherapy. In tissue samples of cancer patients, nuclei of malignant and reactive cells often contain numerous fixed chromocenters that include condensed heterochromatin. As a result, the nuclei appear darkly stained. In biopsy samples, the staining is useful for the identification of malignant cells in specimens containing large numbers of nonmalignant cells. The staining is also useful for identifying infiltrating malignant cells in aspirates of bronchial mucosa. With the development of DNA-staining techniques and the increasing use of chromatin electrophoresis in clinics, it is important to understand the nature of chromatin and the role of chromocenters in chromatin organization and genome expression. This article reviews, through the nucleolar participation in ribosome biosynthesis, the known role of chromocenters in the transcriptional regulation of many important genes. Experimental data, for example from nuclei of transplanted tumors and cells of xenografts, are used
